SOCIAL PROJECTION OF JUSTICE IN THE GLOBAL AIRSPACE OF THE 21ST CENTURY

The work reveals the importance of social projection of justice in global context of international air law. It is noted that the rule of international law is determined as the main ideological issue of social projection of justice.

Social projection is seen as creating of a single global communication system in contemporary culture, the extension of the dominant society and practiced attitudes to values. Social projection in a global environment is characterized by political, economic, cultural integration and unification. The processes of social integration affect all spheres of social life, including legal sphere.

In the modern sense the social project is the innovation projection by an organizer, this aims to create, upgrade or maintain in the altered environment some material or spiritual values, which has space and time and resource limits and the influence of which is considered to be positive on people according to their social value [1, c.9].

Multipolar conceptual system dictates the need to harmonize conflicting parameters and requirements when developing social projects. Finding suitable solutions to meet requirements of various systems of cultural identification, social differentiation and cooperation generates variability of project activity. Today it serves as one of the dominant traits in the basis of values in modern culture, which has a variety of presentation and information exchange means. At the same time, the social construction programs permit "to describe the entity that have own natural life, the product of which is our thoughts and observations which allow us to form laws as necessary relations" [2, p.19]. Communication paradigms changing is influenced by the results of the generalized practice of social projection, which create conditions for continual individual reproduction, society and the worlds they have created. For a person this means the process of introduction into the world that is characterized, on the one hand, by creating visible conditions of the world and on the other hand, opposition to ideal structures.

As for projective personality reproduction and "personality dimension" of social projects the prominent philosopher S. Kryms'kyi wrote: "Experience of future creation and construction in modern civilization has shown that acts of the transformation from theory to practice, from past to future, from potential to actual require a special type activity. Such activity is to be project designing and its main conceptual reflection is project. Project making today is gaining integral status and begins to compete with traditional means of knowledge and activity, even proposing a theory as the main form of scientific knowledge" [3; p.6].

The system of social projection techniques is based on the following properties of consciousness as psychology of images formation, the ability to free association, the development of subjective perception of space, logical organization of information and value relationship examination. Accordingly, models of the world operating, goal-setting, planning, decision-making procedures, adjustment operations, new systems development of evaluating results and perspectives of social institutions development, including global air rights are becoming the attributes of social projection of justice.

The international air law is a part of Global Institute of International Public Law and follows fundamental principles determined in the UN Charter and in the Declaration of Principles. Contemporary international air law "contains universally acknowledged and compulsory to all countries principles and norms of behavior that are created by agreements between the entities, such as the principles of non-aggression, national self-determination, peaceful resolution of conflicts, disarmament, human rights respect, international agreements following"[4].

Stated in the Charter of the United Nations basic principles of international law are the basis of international legal relations and are generally recognized standards of the highest order, to ensure stable and effective functioning of the international system. Key principles of international law are reflected in the authoritative issues of air law and include:

- Rule of law, in the form of "institutional objectification of law, equal and fair limit of freedom, which is reflected in the principle of legal consciousness, which provide self-social relations" [5, p.13];

- The legality which supplies the form of state-specific legal regime by means of which general compulsory measurements of legal rules are ensured;

- Coordination of elements in the system and structure of aviation law, which enables the formation of law based on the clear structure of its elements.

Thus, projective patterns are traced in the globalization process of justice in the sphere of air law: firstly, in the process of justice development we can see gradual transformation from law regulation character to fair dimension of freedom, where the emphasis is put on legal permissions and subjective rights. Secondly, personal independence and human rights are acquiring more stable legal status. Thirdly, the power of the state is subjected to comprehensive regulation generally accepted by international norms of higher order and is becoming dependent on the civil society. Lastly, more humanistic principles are detected in the construction of legal regulation.

These conformities with law have led to consolidation in the global sense of justice common to all mankind principles such as: the rule of rights and freedoms of a personality and citizen in the legal organization of public and social life; strengthening of respect to law and order, ideas and values of law and order; citizens' legal activity in exercising their rights and performing their own legal duties.

Conclusion

In today's global world, social projection of justice is characterized by aiming to progress as a definite social value, personality-centered approach, where an individual appears to be as fulfillment of creative activity, and that lets him/her feel being "inscribed" in the history with prospects for future. The rule of law is becoming the main ideological issue of justice social projection and personality and his/her freedom, equality and justice are recognized as absolute values within the international legal system.
